1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to the field of software development and, more particularly, to a method and system for determining a priority for a software module in a software application.

2. Description of the Related Art Many software applications utilize various modules to perform various functions. The modules within a given application are typically, although not necessarily, written in the same programming language. For example, an application may include a module written in the Java programming language and another module written in the C/C++ programming language. In the prior art, the priority of the modules is usually not taken into consideration when determining which module to start execution of a software application. That is, the modules are typically started in order of the modularity of the module. For example, a module written in C/C++ is generally executed before a module written in Java, regardless of their relative priority. In addition, in the prior art, modules may receive input during execution of the software application. The modules may also write output during execution of the software application. The modules receive input and write output at some predetermined rate. For example, the modules may receive input at intervals of 2 milliseconds, write output at intervals of 10 milliseconds, and exit the software application at intervals of 100 milliseconds. If the priority of the modules within a software application is not taken into consideration, the software application may not behave as expected. In particular, software applications may exhibit different behaviors depending on whether a Java module is executed before or after execution of a C/C++ module. For example, it is very difficult to determine which module is causing a given problem in the software application. It is therefore desirable to provide a method and system for determining a priority of a software module within a software application. Unless you've been under a rock for the last month, then you'll know that Valtteri Bottas is a Williams driver, and that means that he will spend three races with the team in 2018. But what exactly does that mean?
